He came in in a bustling in his hands, examined, standing, the papers on his desk and wrote his signature hurriedly in two or three albums brought him by pages. It occurred to me that that signature, like a painting by a master, would be made more valuable the older it becomes. I half admired the pluck of the little boys who dared to trouble him to write bis name in their books, for Senator Thurman has a way of walking, working and looking that makes a man who has not the plea of important business hesitate to approach him. A manner as suggestive though not as grots: que as the Dutchman's notice: "Maybe all you haint no bizness bout here better keep away from those grounds; aint it?" I have made it an object during the week to converse with gentlemen of supposed political foregast, in relation to the probable Democratic candidate for the Presidency. I find of course some diversity may be summed and fo mulated, it is this: Northeas'era Democrats prefer Tilden, with Thurman as second choice; the northwestern Democrats prefer Hen-dricks, with Thurman as second choice, and the southern Democrats are about equally divided between Thurman and Bayard. There seems to be but weak sentiment, here at least, in favor of the chronic aspirants who have been making electioneering tours over the southern States. Senator Thurman is not a magnetically popular man. It has been said of Speaker Kerr, with more poetry than truth, that he makes an enemy every time he shakes a hand; but this might be said with more truth than poetry of the Ohio senator. He would have been the despair of Chesterfield. He has, doubtless, a theoretical knowledge of the science of pleasing (since there is searcely anything that he does not know), but he scorns the practice of the art, and wins men's minds rather ALBANY, N.Y., April 5.—PostmasterGeneral Jewett left on the fast mail this morning, intending to go through to constitutional and political questions in the senate, where he has so long stood the senate has s almost alone against the majority, unfaltering even in the apparent eclipse of party fortune.
